

TYPO CAUSES HAVOC AS FAIR TRADERS CLASH WITH FIR TRADERS

A SIGN erroneously advertising a 'Fir Trade Social' last week led to a commotion in which four students were injured and many more were left seriously unharmed. The event, which brought together two of Oxford's most bitterly opposed factions, will be remembered as the lowest point in the Fair Trade campaign since people found out that Fair Trade chocolate tastes rubbish.

Peter Wolt, Secretary of the Fair Trade Committee, insisted "I definitely remember typing fair. It must have been a printer error. I'm still totally the best candidate for president." Another member of the society added, "The really weird thing is, that's not even how you spell fur."

Oliver Duggit, one of the students physically injured in the fracas, told The Oxymoron, "I saw the sign and I thought 'at last, a chance for me to meet some fellow fur traders, albeit dyslexic ones'". Ironically, due to the extent of the injuries he sustained he has now become dyslexic himself.

Another student commented: "Am I the only one here to buy and sell Christmas trees?"

OXFORD UNIVERSITY STUDENT 'GOES ON TO DO WELL'

IN A WORLD exclusive, released earlier today only on the Oxford University website, it was revealed that Simon Winchall, who studied chemistry at Oxford during the early 1990s, has just been awarded a scientific award for his research work.

"You don't seem to understand how incredible this is" said a university spokesperson. "The idea that people with unparalleled access to Oxford, one of the largest hubs of intelligence in the world, should go on to achieve success in later life, is too interesting not to pass comment on. It's definitely worth writing an article about it on our website, just so people know that it's finally happened."

Students today spoke of their joy at the news. One said: "It's just wonderful. The idea that I too have the potential to be successful following an Oxford degree is so inspiring."

Mr. Winchall is said to have "quite enjoyed" his time at Oxford. The University website is believed to be preparing another such phenomenal scoop for release any day now.

OXFORD STUDENT LIKES RAD CAM'S COBBLES

A STUDENT today confessed that they actually quite like the cobbles in Radcliffe Square.

Elizabeth Bloate, of St. Hugh's, said: "They're not at all painful to walk on and look just like real cobbles that have been there hundreds of years.

"Riding over them on a bike isn't a complete pain in the arse and I've never deliberately avoided Radcliffe Square because they're so cocking annoying."

When our reporter asked her to say more in order to fill space, she added: "I can't think of any better way to spend thousands of pounds than on sticking a load of stupid fucking stones into some concrete where people are trying to walk."
