

GOVERNMENT ADMITS LOSS OF DES BROWNE

THE MINISTRY of Defence has come under heavy criticism in Parliament after the apparent theft of Des Browne, the Secretary of State for Defence, left unattended in a taxi last Tuesday.

Mr Browne is believed to contain the personal details of his close friends and relatives, as well as memories, hopes and fears - information that could cause havoc in the wrong hands.

While David Cameron described the disappearance as “yet more evidence that this Labour government drinks blood, punches babies and smells of wee”, the Ministry of Defence have been quick to calm the fears of the nation.

In a statement last Monday, they reminded panicked Britons that Hilary Benn once went missing for three weeks “only to be found alive and well under some books”.

Despite these reassurances, many people who know Des Browne are terrified that their details will end up in the hands of a wrong-moralled crime-doer.

Security analysts estimate that the information contained in Des Browne could be worth up to £500 on the black market, and even more to white people.

HAS GEORGE GALLOWAY FINALLY LOST IT?

GEORGE Galloway, the controversial idiot, claimed today that the US is responsible for the deaths of half a million Iraqi children between 1990 and 1999 because of its use of trade sanctions to withhold humanitarian aid.

The claim, his most outrageous yet, is based on the hilarious notion that the blocking of hundreds of humanitarian contracts by the US government under the guise of the Oil for Food program may in some way have contributed to the deaths of half a million children under five during the period.

The actions of the US, including the blocking of the sale of water tanker to a country where the major cause of infant mortality was the lack of clean drinking-water are, according to the moustachioed kook, ‘reprehensible’.

chioed kook, ‘reprehensible’.

Dennis Halliday and Hans Von Sponeck, two former heads of the UN Oil For Food program who resigned for ethical reasons, have effortlessly refuted Galloway’s claims. Halliday described the program as “nothing less than genocide”, while von Sponeck called it “a criminal policy”. Despite this, Galloway continues to denounce the scheme, describing it as ‘a criminal policy that amounts to nothing less than genocide’.

Linda Scalpel, OUSU’s VP (Galloway) commented “If you think that deliberately bringing about the deaths of hundreds of thousands of people is mass-murder, odds are you’re either utterly mad or both. It sounds like Galloway really has gone completely bollock-mental.”

Whatever you have to say – we have to listen
